

Elephants coat their skin with mud to protect their skin from sunburn and biting bugs. The Tsetse flies are not as bad in Kenya as they were in the Serengeti, but we needed to be vaccinated against Yellow Fever carried by mosquitoes.

On our last day, we flew to Nairobi and stayed at the Emakoko Lodge inside the Nairobi National Park.

These vervet monkeys, sitting on a narrow bridge, were our welcoming committee. I was warned to keep my balcony doors closed or I could be visited by monkeys and hyraxes - apparently a bad thing.

Pre-lunch with Terry and Sheila ...

... and Don and Heidi

Janice at our house at the Emakoko Lodge, Nairobi National Park. That's Heidi hiding behind me.

My cliff-side room. We reached our house after via a very long and steep funicular cable car journey. What an amazing view.

The House and infinity pool were ours to use for the day, but Heidi was the only one brave enough to go in the pool.

Setting up for our last dinner in Africa. It was a wonderful journey.

I must say that re-creating Janice's African Safari has been fun. Together, we have jiggled and joggled the sundry bits and pieces hither and yon until all fell neatly into place. Jan has been remarkably patient as I got this photo before that photo and that caption here instead of there.

We trust that you will enjoy her journey in Africa with her friends as much we have enjoyed assembling it.
